Mural by Students in Milverton and Realt na Mara National Schools 2016

This mural project began with the principal of Milverton National School, Johnny Tyndall, travelling to Nicaragua with Trócaire in February 2016 on a teacher study trip. He was inspired by the work of Funarte, a partner of Trócaire in Nicaragua. Through creative, energetic activities, Funarte ensures that Nicaragua's youth are aware of their human rights and involved in building a society that respects them. One vehicle for this creative education and action is 'muralismo', or mural art in the city of Estelí.

Through development education workshops in Milverton and Realt na Mara National Schools in Skerries the 5th and 6th class students explored issues surrounding climate change, looking at the local and global implications, and focusing on a case study of Nicaragua. Their deep sense of justice and empathy for those around the world suffering from the effects of climate change, and their desire to take action for climate justice, is evident in the final artwork. The artist Eimear McNally supported the young artists on their journey from exploration and learning to creative expression of their collective response to the issue of climate change.

The mural is an example of local to global learning in action, bringing awareness to the equality young people strive for as they look to the future, and the rights and responsibilities we all have to make this a reality.

When people see the mural we want them to feel like they can make a change and take action on climate change.
